Weekly Market Recap

Just five minutes before Wall Street's close, the S&P 500 erased an earlier decline that had exceeded 1% on Friday. A massive options expiration added a fresh layer of volatility, with over 21 billion shares traded across U.S. exchanges — marking the highest volume of 2025 so far. Over the past month, trillions of dollars have been wiped from U.S. equity markets, as investors grapple with mounting concerns around an economic slowdown, tariffs, geopolitical tensions, and stretched valuations in the tech sector. In response, trend-following systematic funds have turned net short on U.S. equities for the first time in over a year. These commodity trading advisers — which base their positions on market momentum rather than fundamentals — have cut their S&P 500 exposure to the lowest level since 2023, according to data from Goldman Sachs' trading desk. Meanwhile, retail investors injected more than $12 Billion into U.S. stocks during the week ending March 19, JPMorgan Chase & Co. data show. Market watchers often monitor individual investors closely, as they tend to reduce exposure later in market cycles. The recent surge in retail buying could signal that equities may not have reached a bottom just yet.
